Both Far Away.

A prominent Kentucky lawyer had been in Jackson during the hearing of a big land case, and after the strain of several weeks in the courtroom had decided to take a trip in the mountains and enjoy the quieting influences of the hills. He traveled the paths and narrow mountain roads till he found himself, at the end of several days' journey, about 40 or 50 miles from the railroad. It was about noon, the lawyer judged, for his watch had run down and he could not be exact. But in the midst of this deep contemplation the lawyer came upon an old darky sitting upon a boulder alongside the road.

"What time have you," he asked of the old darky.

"Well, suh, boss, the old watch says she's about ten minutes to 12," was the reply.

"Is that sun time, or railroad time?" again questioned the lawyer.

"What difference 'at make. One's nigh as fur from heah as de yudder."

Real Prohibition for Georgia.

The new State prohibition law went into effect in Georgia yesterday, and from every section of the State comes the rather definite statement that the law is going to be enforced. About this there is, in fact, no room for doubt.

We have been a long time coming to it, 'tis true, but this is, mainly, because public sentiment has not heretofore demanded it. And it is a commonly accepted theory that public sentiment must be behind a law to secure its strict enforcement.

If we grant this much as to the past—the nine years, or more, that Georgia has been "experimenting" with a sort of "half-and-half" prohibition law—it should be conceded, we think, that we speak in truth and fairness when we say the situation has entirely changed and that the sentiment of the State is now almost solidly in favor of a thoroughly conscientious enforcement of the new laws.

We might, in fact, go a step further, and say the public is going to demand, if necessary, strict enforcement of the law. This is true even with people who are opposed to prohibition; for, while they may not like the law itself, they like open and defiant violation of law even less.

In this respect, the past nine years of near-prohibition in Georgia have taught us a great deal, and have caused many to be convinced who did not believe they could ever be convinced. It has been abundantly demonstrated, in the first place, that "prohibition does prohibit"—when ever there has been any conscientious effort to enforce the law. And it has, also, been demonstrated general disregard of the prohibition law—as was the case in certain cities of the State—is a most unwholesome and undesirable thing; so much so, in fact, that the illegal traffic would have failed of its own weight even had there been no further legislation on the subject in Georgia.

It has, furthermore, been demonstrated more and more every day, that the best thought and sentiment, not merely of Georgia, but of most other States, is against the open, unrestricted, irresponsible sale of intoxicants; is, in fact, rapidly crystallizing in favor of out-and-out prohibition.

Nor is it mere "sentiment" that is behind this movement, but the calm, deliberate judgment of a people—whose numbers are ever growing; are

An Expensive Visit.

A physician tells this story of a bright boy, his own, who had reached the mature age of 9, after an early career marked by wild and mischievous pranks.

His restless nature had made him somewhat of a torment to his teacher at times, and one afternoon not long ago she kept him after the others were dismissed and had a serious talk with him. Perhaps she was a little afraid that that her admonitions were falling on stony ground. Anyway, she finally said:

"I certainly will have to ask your father to come and see me."

"Don't do it," said the boy.

The teacher thought she had made an impression.

"Yes," she repeated, "I must send for your father."

"You better not," said the boy.

"Why not?" inquired the teacher.

"Cause he charges $2 a visit," said the scamp.

being daily recruited from the ranks of the cool-headed business men—who have come to see that whiskey benefits nobody except the man who sells it; nor even him in the long run.

The truth of the matter is, the world has "got on" to old Bill Booze's game, at last; and doesn't care to play it any longer. For it is all going out and nothing coming in, for the public; while it is just the other way around for Booze.

Yes, we are pretty certain the prohibition law is going to be rigidly enforced throughout Georgia—including Augusta, Savannah and a few others, heretofore, irreconcilables. Evidently, the liquor dealers think so, too; for they are either going into other lines of business—or moving to Chattanooga, where they hope to remain only a few months, or a few years, at best.

The only trouble from now on, therefore, will be with the "bootleggers;" or a class of dealers who are willing to run the risk of one or two arrests—and for whom a chaingang sentence, at the very outset, will be a proper answer and a sufficient remedy.

Let there be no mistake, Georgia has "gone dry"—except for such limited shipments as are permitted under the law. And what's more—Georgia is going to stay dry. Public sentiment has, at last, come to a full approval of such a programme—and that settles it, in Georgia as elsewhere.—Augusta Chronicle.

Sample Was All Right.

Jacky had been asked out to a grown-up dinner. Swelling with pride, he took his seat at the bottom of the table and looked around—slightly awestricken—at the imposing collection of aunts and uncles.

Then his attention became fixed on the ancient relative who was carving an enormous turkey and his mouth watered as he saw the big helpings being handed around.

But the carver who did not know much about little boys cut off a tiny portion for Jacky.

"Is this the part of the bird you like my little man?" he asked, as the servant handed Jacky the plate.

Jack looked at it for a moment and then handed it back.

"Yes," he said, "I'll have some of that, please."
